THE METALLIC AGE NOW.

Truly this is the age of metals. The four standard metals, gold, silver, copper, and steel, may be said to form the cornerstone of the world-wide business structure. In the Western nations, gold is the basis of monetary credit. In the East, on the Asiatic continent especially, and in most of Latin-America silver is still the foundation on which money values rest. These two together form the monetary basis of the modern usiness world. The other side of business is machinery, and in the mechanhave more to do with our life than any other two metals. Take copper from the world and the light of cities, towns, and villages goes out. Take steel away and the highways of traffic and travel and the highways of traine and travel are thrust back into antiquity. Possibly, after all, the greatest of these four is the youngest of them. For what is it that divides the ancient world from the modern except steel? And what is it that makes modern life most modern except copper, for the part which it plays in communication between man and man?—Wall Street Journal.
